Comment by the artist: "These vessels are RARE. The photographic glass was exposed in a darkroom under an enlarger just like a piece of photo paper. After the photosensitive glass is exposed, it is laminated to an optical glass shape using specially designed optical epoxy. If light is blasted straight at the front, the silver in the photosensitive glass will project the silver brown. The photo is completely light stable and secure. Many have them exhibited in front of a window which could also have the sun shining on it. Also, this particular piece was used on the front cover of a produced calendar by the American Craft Museum, close to the same year it was made. If you want, I can look for the publication."
